The Project consists of removing and reconstructing a single 48" diameter drainage structure located at the Camp Ashland Army National Guard training site. The drainage structure is a feature of the federal Clear Creek levee system on the right bank of the Platte River. The structure was originally installed to convey excess water from Turner Lake to the Platte River. The design of the new drainage structure is similar to the existing except that the pipe invert elevation is set approximately two feet higher than the existing structure. The new reinforced concrete culvert pipe will have a concrete flared end section, an outlet headwall with sluice gate, concrete bedding, and seepage filters. A ring levee will be constructed prior to excavation within the Clear Creek levee. Work will also include removing and replacing rip rap protection, BMPs, and site restoration.
